Information about authors

Jacinta Colley is enrolled in a PhD in the School of Human Services and Social Work, Griffith Health Institute, Griffith University, where she is exploring enriched environments for people with brain injuries. Jacinta received the University medal in recognition of academic excellence in her bachelors degree, awarded with first class Honours.

Michelle Crozier is a PhD Scholar and Senior Research Assistant in the School of Human Services and Social Work, Griffith Health Institute, Griffith University. Her research explores policy and rhetoric in terms of quality service provision for vulnerable people. She has worked extensively in the health and human services sector, with particular emphasis on supporting people with disabilities to lead good lives as valued and included members of the community.

Jed Donoghue has a PhD in Sociology and is an Honorary Research Associate at the University of Tasmania. He has researched articles on social housing, citizenship rights and national identity.

Carolyn Ehrlich is Research Fellow at the School of Human Services and Social Work, Griffith Health Institute, Griffith University. She has extensive clinical experience, having worked for more than 25 years as a Registered Nurse specialising in general medicine and community health care. Carolyn is particularly interested in implementation research that seeks to increase the capacity of the workforce to respond to the health care needs of people with complex health needs. She is also interested in exploring the interaction between people and the health care system.

Caroline Fleay is a Lecturer at the Centre for Human Rights Education, Curtin University. Her research interests consider transnational activism and human rights, and the rights of asylum seekers and refugees in Australia. Caroline's current research projects include the monitoring of immigration detention and the experiences of asylum seekers in Australia without the right to work.

Ellie Francis-Brophy has a PhD in Sociology and is a social researcher at Reading University, UK. Ellie's research interests include social housing, social policy development and education.

Bina Gubhaju is an adjunct Research Fellow at the Australian Demographic & Social Research Institute, Australian National University. Her background is in Demography and Sociology. She is currently working on a project on developing indicators of multiple family disadvantage using the Longitudinal Survey of Australian Children. The project further seeks to examine the consistency and continuity of family disadvantage longitudinally.

Lisa Hartley is a Lecturer at the Centre for Human Rights Education, Curtin University. Lisa's main fields of research are asylum seeker and refugees rights, refugee resettlement, and prejudice towards marginalised social groups. She has a range of publications in the fields of refugee studies and community psychology as well as public research reports.

Ilan Katz is Professor in the Social Policy Research Centre, UNSW, which he directed from 2005 to 2011. His previous career was in the United Kingdom where he worked as a social worker, manager and policy maker. His research interests include evaluation of complex policies and programs, evidence-informed policy, child protection, Indigenous social policy, intergenerational mobility and comparative social policy.

Mary Anne Kenny is an Associate Professor and Director of the Centre for Human Rights Education, Curtin University. She also holds a position as Associate Professor of the School of Law, Murdoch University. Her research interests include human rights, rights of asylum seekers and refugees. Her particular research interest includes young people and children.

Helen McLaren is a Lecturer in the Social Work discipline, School of Social and Policy Studies, Flinders University. She was formerly a researcher for the South Australian Department of Families and Communities, the Ministerial Advisory Committee: Students with Disabilities, and The Australian Centre for Child Protection. Dr McLaren has research interests in family violence, child protection and wellbeing, and child and family social policy.

Heidi Muenchberger is Associate Professor and Principal Research Fellow at the Griffith Health Institute, Griffith University. She has worked in the area of Rehabilitation for the past 17 years, beginning her career as a clinical neuropsychologist. Her research is centred on the experiences of people who have survived catastrophic injury and illness. In addition, her work aims to investigate the broader rehabilitation context, health and housing pathways, and models of care. She is widely published in international journals.

Gerry Redmond is Associate Professor at the School of Social and Policy Studies, Flinders University, Adelaide. His research interests encompass child development, child poverty and deprivation, inequalities between children, and how these evolve through time. He is currently leading a national study of child wellbeing (the Australian Child Wellbeing Project) that is using child-centred techniques to measure differences and inequalities in wellbeing among Australian children in their middle years.

Diana Smart is a Senior Research Fellow at the Australian Institute of Family Studies with responsibility for the Building a New Life in Australia and Pathways of Care studies. She previously held responsibility for the Longitudinal Study of Australian Children and has also had a 25 year association with the Australian Temperament Project. Diana's research interests include child and youth development and transitions, pathways across time, and vulnerability and the fostering of resilience.
